"Just to think of Uncle Wilford brings a surge of happy memories...He was never too busy, too tired, or too old to take an interest in those about him."

—Alta Knowlton (Lindsay), granddaughter of Susan Leggett through Sarah LaVina Clark Knowlton, was Wilford W. Clark's niece, 1962. (Wilford and Sarah were half-siblings.)

"As a small lad, I first knew Uncle Wilford when he would visit us in Farmington from his home in Georgetown. He impressed me as being exceedingly keen, clear of mind, straightforward, and understanding of people and of the world around him. I thought that he must be a fine Representative in the Idaho Legislature. And I recall him at family reunions where a great kindness seemed to possess him. He was gentle and very fond of his family, and this spirit reached out to those of us who did not know him so well. One could almost be sure that he was patient and slow to judge adversely. I had the clear impression that everyone he met was glad to see him."

—Obert Clark Tanner, son of Annie Clark (Tanner), who was Wilford's half-sister through Susan Leggett Clark, 1965.

Regrets

"Any regular thing which he did not know—for example, not knowing how to read music—was dismaying to him."

—Ruby Dorius Clark Rhodes, 1961.

"In the spring of 1951 or so, we (LeGrand, Rhoda, and Mary
